And her eyes have no expression; they want the fire of yours, ma am. effect on the incorrigible Mrs Lennox; and caps, flowers, and ribbons, still strewed the room, from which articles she was very composedly making a selection, when Charles once more told her he would not wait another moment. But put on what bonnet she likes, she will never have your looks. This speech had the desired effect, and Mrs Lennox, soothed by the flattery of her waiting-maid, soon got into better humour. Charles now entered, to say that Major Willoughby and Captain Spencer were below, and he therefore begged that she would finish her toilette and come down. But though Mrs Lennox considered her attire to be quite good enough for her husband's family, she did not think it...
