But even as she spoke there came a rush in the air, and the noble form swept by her. She felt his strong wing supporting hers, she heard his love words in her ear. Come up higher, little one, he cried, a little higher; my mother and my brothers and sisters must see my sweet wife. The Dove collected her strength, and urged her tired wings, and up, up, up, they flew, till the dim world lay far beneath, and the great forest trees stood like shrubs upon the plain. Up they flew, still upward and upward, then with a sudden plunge, and giddy whirls, shot down toward his ancestral halls. He had thought that his mother s heart would open to take in the pale, trembling stranger; that his brothers would bow themselves before her; that his sisters would entreat her tenderly, as only his sisters could. He waited in a delicious triumph for this affectionate welcome, but waited in vain. Who is this poor half dead, fainting creature? asked the mother, scornfully. My wife, said the Eagle, proudly. Your wife! shrieked the mother; this pitiful, insignificant creature, the wife of the king of the birds? A little panting thing! cried his sisters. A mean-spirited, forlorn Dove! cried his brothers. That ever I should have lived to witness such degradation! cried the mother; that my son, the son of such a father, with such expectations, should ally...
