Excerpt from The Principles of Collegiate Education Discussed and Elucidated, in a Description of Gnoll College, Vale of Neath, South Wales: A National Institution Adapted to the Wants of the Age The foregoing remarks on the advantage accruing to every student from passing through the preliminary course of mathematics, are equally applicable to the other divisions of the scheme, viz., to Mechanics, Physics, Chemistry, Natural History, Human History, and Design. It is unnecessary to advocate the utility of the mechanical or physical sciences to an engineer in any branch of that profession; and every day serves to prove their increasing importance to the agriculturist, not only with regard to machinery, but to the economical use of carts, horses, ploughs, and various other applications of power. It will be admitted that much time and capital has been wasted by manufacturers, and even by professional chemists, through neglect of the principles of mechanics and physics. Indeed the course of instruction in ordinary schools already recognizes, in a limited degree, the utility of these sciences in the general education of the humblest youths. If one reflects on the immediate application of the Mechanical Arts and the Forces of Nature even in domestic life, it will be obvious, without going further, that some knowledge of these subjects forms an essential part of a superior education. Only those students whose intended pursuits require an introduction to the higher applications of these sciences, will be expected to follow them beyond the preliminary course.
